SOURCE NOTE

The original records reproduced for this publication are held by the Manuscripts Division of the Library of Congress, Washington, D.C., with the exception of the Reports of the NAACP Secretary and the Reports of the Legal Department. These appear on Reel 2 of the microfilm and were loaned to UPA from a private collection whose holdings are more complete for these particular reports than the holdings of the Library of Congress.

EDITORIAL NOTE

This microform edition is a continuation of Papers of the NAACP, Part 1, 1909-1950 published by University Publications of America (UPA) in 1982. It brings through 1955 the following subseries of records that were begun in the original edition:

Minutes of the Board of Directors

Monthly Reports of NAACP Officers

Records of Annual Business Meetings

Records of Annual Conventions.

The subseries of "Special Correspondence" contained in Part 1 of Papers of the NAACP does not extend beyond 1939 in the original collection, and therefore does not continue in the present supplement. Records of Annual Conventions have been included in their entirety in this Supplement, whereas in the original edition they were published minus the background correspondence. Container inventories for the original collection are microfilmed at the beginning of the first reel of this Supplement. Original container numbers for each file are marked on every file folder to assist in scholarly citation.

All files reproduced on this microfilm have been filmed in their entirety, with only carbons and duplicated copies deleted. File series which have been drawn upon for this Supplement include:

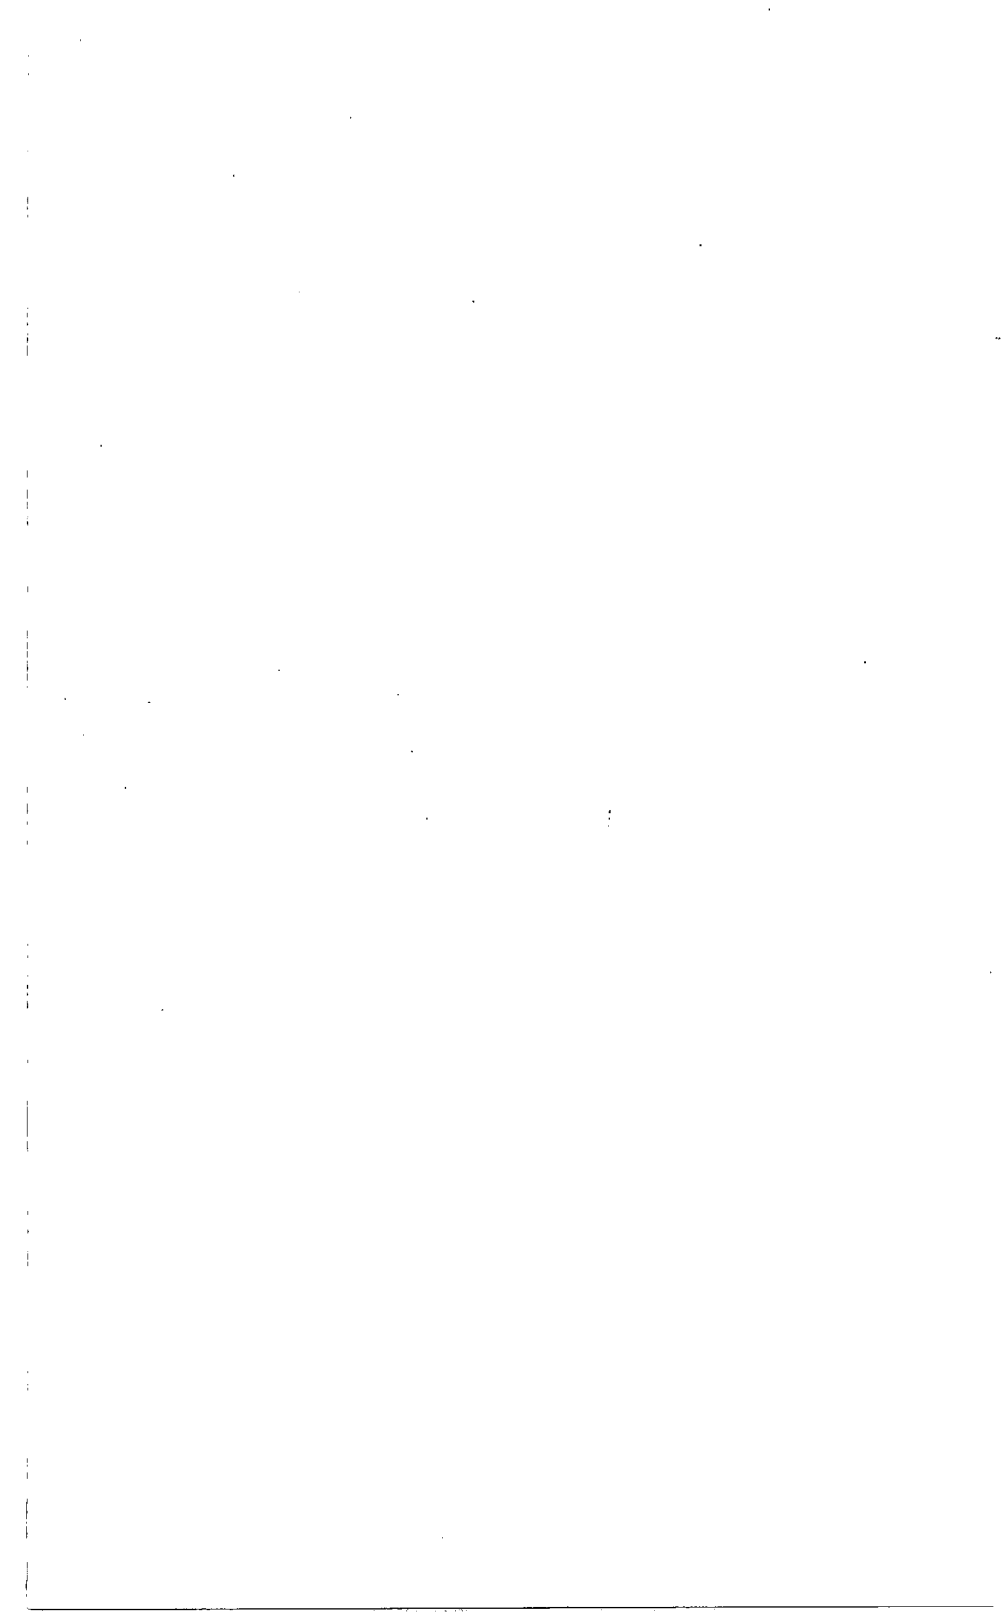

Group I, Series A, Box 6 for Minutes of the Board of Directors

Personal collection for Reports of the Secretary and of the Legal Department

Group II, Series A, Boxes 62 and 63 for Records of Annual Business Meetings

Group II, Series A, Boxes 47-61 for Records of Annual Conventions.

Researchers should also be aware of six additional microform editions of Papers of the NAACP published by UPA under the direction of Professors August Meier and John Bracey as part of the microform series, Black Studies Research Sources. These editions, which make possible further in-depth research on key subject areas documented by the NAACP collection, include: Papers of the NAACP, Part 2, Personal Correspondence of Selected NAACP Officials, 1919-1939; Part 3, The Campaign for Educational Equality, 1913-1950; Part 4, The Voting Rights Campaign, 1916-1950; Part 5, The Campaign against Residential Segregation, 1914-1955; Part 6, The Scottsboro Case, 1931-1950; and Part 7, The Anti-Lynching Campaign, 1912-1955.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

General

For the most part the NAACP's activities in the early 1950s concerned issues that had occupied it from the late 1940s and would continue to do so well into the 1960s, including housing and employment discrimination, mob violence against blacks, defense against allegations of Communist influence, congressional lobbying in Washington, and the prosecution of its legal redress campaign.

However, one event of particular significance to the black/civil rights movement must be especially noted for the 1950s: the NAACP's victory in the case of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, which was decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1954. The immediate controversy in the Brown case was the legality of racial segregation in public schools, but the Supreme Court's decision was wide ranging on constitutional grounds and held implications far beyond the sphere of public education. Not only did the Court declare that segregation in public schools was unconstitutional, but it went further to declare that any form of government support of racial discrimination violates the Constitution. In so ruling it explicitly overruled its own 1898 decision sanctioning segregation of the races. Since then, an elaborate and degrading institution of racial segregation had developed in many parts of the United States. It governed relations between the races in public education, hospitals, housing, parks, theaters, public transportation, and many other public facilities. In light of the Brown decision, this entire social institution was open to effective legal challenge.

In this sense, the Brown decision represented a foundation for all subsequent civil rights litigation and a beginning in the battle which the NAACP would wage into the 1960s to dismantle racial segregation in America. The Brown decision, however, also represented the culmination of decades of court battles sponsored by the Association in the cause of the civil rights of Afro-Americans. The records contained in this Supplement document the NAACP's strategies and actions both in anticipation of the Brown ruling and in the immediate aftermath of the victory. (Researchers can study the course of the NAACP legal redress campaigns leading up to the Brown decision in Parts 3, 4, and 5 of UPA's Papers of the NAACP, particularly in Part 3, The Campaign for Educational Equality.)

Apart from the repercussions of the Brown decision, other topics which are frequently documented in this Supplement include efforts to mobilize blacks in the deep South to support the civil rights movement; the emergence of postwar residential segregation patterns; pervasive employment discrimination against blacks; insinuations of Communist and subversive influence in the civil rights movement; efforts to involve black youth leaders in the program of the NAACP; and instances of violence and intimidation against blacks by white vigilantes and mobs.

The problem of Communist involvement in the civil rights movement during the early 1950s was an especially sensitive one due to the intense anti-Communist climate in national politics. The NAACP was obliged to react on several occasions when the image of its officers was impugned by red-baiting enemies. At one point in 1955 the Attorney General of Georgia publicly charged that the NAACP was a subversive organization.

Communists were active, however, in some aspects of the civil rights movement. In the case of the NAACP, the records reveal that a focal point of such activity was the Association's Youth Councils and College Chapters. Both national officers and NAACP youth leaders exhibited concern over Communist involvement at the grass roots of the organization on a number of occasions, especially in background materials in the Annual Convention files. (Researchers should consult UPA's Papers of the NAACP, Part 6: The Scottsboro Case for documentation on the shaping of NAACP leaders' attitudes toward Communists.)

The relations between the NAACP leadership and black youth can be explored with profit on a broader range of issues than Communist activity, however. By the 1950s, the NAACP was a mature organization whose national leadership had been stable for more than a decade. Efforts on the part of youth leaders to secure a wider role for themselves at some expense to the NAACP hierarchy are apparent in the papers, particularly in Convention Committee files. Tensions such as these usually fall far short of open conflict, but they nonetheless provide insight into the relations between the Association and the younger generation of civil rights activists.

Residential housing segregation is yet another major issue which surfaces repeatedly throughout the early 1950s. Typically, the postwar pattern of segregated housing involved the development of whites-only suburban housing tracts and the abandonment of certain inner city neighborhoods to blacks. Much of the process depended upon federal housing policies which had expanded dramatically since the Second World War. Legislation for programs such as federal mortgage insurance, urban redevelopment, and slum clearance failed to include anti-discrimination provisions. Moreover, the programs were administered at the local level where prejudice disguised as policy proved difficult to root out. The records reveal the NAACP struggling, often in vain, to stem the tide of subsidized housing segregation. It launched court suits, complained to federal officials, and lobbied Congress for fair housing legislation. Disputes with private developers are well-illustrated in the Secretary's reports on Levittown developments. Disputes over housing integration also involved the NAACP in several of the most serious instances of racial violence it encountered in the early 1950s, most notably the Cicero, Illinois, race riot of 1951 and the bombing of black homes in Dallas, Texas, at the same time. (Researchers should consult Part 5 of UPA's Papers of the NAACP, The Campaign against Residential Segregation, for greater detail on the Association's efforts in this area.)

The NAACP's efforts to lobby Congress are still another important feature of its activities in the early 1950s. Housing and employment discrimination were two areas of especial concern before Congress. The NAACP lobbied unsuccessfully for fair housing legislation and for a resuscitation of the Fair Employment Practices Commission. Sections of the Secretary's Reports dealing with the Washington Bureau describe these and other congressional lobbying efforts. They also reveal the Association's efforts at coalition-building--a great deal of which was an attempt to forge alliances with liberal-minded labor unions, particularly those of the CIO. Apparent also in the accounts of NAACP congressional lobbying is the record of the Association's enmity with Dixiecrat and conservative congressional blocs.

Mob violence against blacks was an issue that had long confronted the NAACP, and the early 1950s were no exception. Controversies over black movement to white neighborhoods sparked several episodes of violence as noted above. Vigilante attacks upon blacks in the South--long a problem against which the Association struggled--lingered on into the 1950s. Attacks calculated to discourage political activity among blacks in the deep South are noteworthy. The NAACP, in the meanwhile, redoubled its efforts to organize blacks throughout the deep South in the early 1950s, particularly in Mississippi from which reports of white hostility toward black political activity are regular. (Part 7 of UPA's Papers of the NAACP, The Anti-Lynching Campaign, details the Association's efforts in response to violence and intimidation against blacks. Additionally, Series B of Part 7 details efforts to secure federal anti-lynching legislation and incidentally provides insight into the establishment of the NAACP as a congressional lobby.)

As a result of the Korean War, a number of special issues presented themselves to the Association. The NAACP moved aggressively to ensure that President Truman's executive order integrating the armed forces was carried out to the fullest. It monitored integration of active units and also pushed for the integration of educational, residential, and recreational facilities on military bases. It also fought discriminatory policies of the Veterans Administration, particularly segregation in veterans' hospitals.

A final issue which engaged the Association regularly during the early 1950s was the stereotypical depiction of blacks on television and over the radio. The Association labored to counter the derogatory images of blacks portrayed in such shows as "Amos 'n' Andy." It also encouraged the mass media to consider hiring additional black actors and background employees.

Minutes of the Board of Directors

The Board of Directors is the highest policy-making body in the NAACP, and its minutes constitute the central record of the Association's activities. The Board considered all matters of policy, ranging from the type of litigation to be taken up by the legal department to the issues to be lobbied before Congress. Matters overriding established strategy as well as contingencies in the execution of strategy were regularly brought to its attention. In addition to its responsibilities in guiding substantive NAACP policy, it also remained in charge of a number of important administrative duties including fund raising and major expenses, the certification of NAACP branches and disputes in the administration of those branches, the appointment of national executives, and the nomination of candidates for its own body (which it shared with the Convention). The best published reference work on the internal structure of the NAACP is B. Joyce Ross, Joel E. Spingarn and the Rise of the NAACP, 1909-1939 (New York, 1972).

Reports of the Secretary

The secretary is the highest ranking officer of the NAACP national staff. The position is in effect that of the chief executive officer, responsible for all day-to-day operations and accountable to the Board of Directors. For nearly the entire period covered by this Supplement, the secretary of the NAACP was Walter F. White, who had held the position since 1930. Upon his death in 1955, White was succeeded by Roy Wilkins. Wilkins had been groomed to succeed White by holding the position of administrator for at least a year prior to the latter's death, during which time the Administrator's Reports were in effect the Secretary's Reports.

The Secretary's Reports were prepared for the monthly Board of Directors' meetings, and they provide another, deeper level of detail on the Association's monthly activities. By 1951, the Secretary's Reports consolidated the reports of all the other national office departments with the exception of those of the Legal Department (which are included in this collection after the Secretary's Reports for each year). Thus each Secretary's Report contains reports for the Department of Branches and Youth Work, the Department of Public Relations, the Washington Bureau, the Church Secretary, the Membership Secretary, and the Labor Relations Assistant.

In addition to these consolidated departmental reports, the Secretary's Reports discuss the progress of litigation in the major court cases the Association pursued and any noteworthy events to which the Secretary had responded in the previous month. Subjects covered by the Secretary's Reports are thoroughly indexed in the subject index of the user guide.

Legal Department Reports

Legal Department Reports were also prepared for the monthly Board of Directors' meetings but not as regularly as the monthly Secretary's Reports. The main object of the reports was to account for progress and setbacks in the NAACP's fledgling legal redress campaigns. The reports also cover conferences attended by Legal Department Director Thurgood Marshall as well as the progress of background research being conducted by the staff. The reports on litigation are typically organized by subject, including criminal cases, education cases, health care discrimination cases, housing cases, military discrimination cases, public accommodations cases, recreation facilities cases, and public transportation cases. By 1953, the reports of the Legal Department are supplemented with the reports of the Legal Defense and Educational Fund, a tax-exempt arm of the NAACP, which was established in the late 1940s.

Records of Annual Business Meetings

The major function of the Annual Business Meeting was to elect the Board of Directors from among candidates offered by a Nominating Committee. The committee had six members, three appointed by the Annual Convention and three by the Board, with a seventh member who was the Chairman of the Board. In theory, the meeting was open to the entire membership, but in practice rarely more than a few hundred members attended. Attendance lists are included among the records along with background correspondence, press releases, and a few speeches and summaries of the Association's work for the preceding year.

Records of Annual Conventions

The NAACP Annual Conventions served a number of important functions. Among the foremost was attracting publicity for the Association. To this end, prominent individuals were invited to address the convention or to submit a "greeting." The convention itself passed resolutions on a wide range of political issues that were often calculated to attract the attention of the press. Special events such as testimonial banquets, protests, or commemorative gatherings were scheduled. In at least one instance in the early 1950s, the very selection of the convention site was calculated as a publicity-attracting event. In 1951 the convention met in Atlanta, Georgia, where racial segregation was practiced by local hotels. Efforts to secure bookings for blacks in whites-only hotels caused a major stir, which the NAACP exploited to draw attention to the larger issue of segregation in public facilities. All of the publicity-getting aspects of the convention were carefully orchestrated through the Association's Public Relations Department, which took painstaking efforts to inform the press--the national press, the black press, and the local press, as well as the national news media, including television and radio network news, Associated Press, and weekly news magazines such as Time and Look--of the newsworthy developments.

Another important function of the convention was to afford regular personal contact between the national office and the NAACP branches. Several sessions of every convention were taken up with "workshops" in which national officers instructed delegates in such things as fund raising and local branch administration, as well as how to initiate and follow through on civil rights litigation at the local level. On occasion, complaints with local branches were taken up at the convention, including such matters as delinquent dues payments or branch administration. For the branch of the host city, the convention presented the opportunity to interest local churches and civic groups in the work of the NAACP and to use the favorable convention publicity to seek new members and new sources of funding.

Finally, the convention afforded NAACP branch delegates a degree of input on the national program. The convention had a minority voice in selecting the membership of the important Nominating Committee, which chose a list of candidates for the all-important Board of Directors. (An equal number of appointees to the Nominating Committee was made by the Board of Directors itself. The Chairman of the Board was included as the tie-breaking member of the Nominating Committee.) The convention then voted on the composition of the Board of Directors from among the candidates presented by the Nominating Committee. The delegates also selected members for a number of standing committees governing the operation of the convention, including the Committee on Conference Procedure, the Resolutions Committee, and the Credentials Committee. Finally, the resolutions, on which convention delegates voted, served as guideposts for NAACP national policy making, which was largely the responsibility of the Board of Directors.

Brief summaries of the major subdivisions of the Annual Convention files follow:

Committee on Conference Procedure: This committee, composed of three members chosen by the convention and two members selected by the national staff, prepared rules and regulations for the seating of delegates, the credentials procedure, the conduct of convention business sessions, and the nomination and election of convention officers. In addition, it was responsible for dividing the NAACP branches, youth chapters, and college chapters into geographic regions and then for devising formulas for proportional regional representation of delegates on the various convention committees (Credentials, Resolutions, Rules, etc.).

The records of the Committee on Conference Procedure cast valuable light on behind-the-scenes politics of the conventions, including relations between the national office and the larger convention and the maintenance of the NAACP internal power structure. They often reveal broad political and strategic objectives of NAACP officers, as well.

Committee and Staff: The committee referred to in these files is an Executive Conference Committee composed of members of the national staff, while the staff is the national office staff. The Executive Conference Committee coordinated the activities of numerous non-policy-making Convention Committees, including the Housing Committee (responsible for finding convention hotel rooms), the Souvenir Program Committee, the Entertainment Committee, the Publicity Committee, the Committee on Community Cooperation (within the host city), the Registration Committee, the Welcome Committee, the Finance Committee, and other ad hoc committees. Since these committees were staffed by members of the host city branch, these files contain a good deal of correspondence with local branch officers. The national staff materials mostly concern the selection of national staffers who would receive expense-paid invitations to the convention.

Delegates: The Delegates files contain lists of delegates and visitors to the conventions. In some cases the lists are arranged by states. Often, however, there is no arrangement. These lists were apparently compiled as the delegate's credentials were certified. Youth and college chapter delegates are provided on separate lists. There is occasional correspondence from the Credentials Committee.

Expenses: The Expenses files contain a great deal of mundane receipts and accounts but also hold a few items of significance. Included are accounts for travel and per diem expenses of national office staffers, and summaries of convention fund raising, expenses, and branch debts that had been collected at the convention.

Form Letters: These are circular letters sent to the NAACP branches by the national office detailing such matters as the upcoming convention theme, convention rules and procedures, advice regarding travel and accommodations, or any special features or major issues impending for the convention. Form letters, which detail the structure and procedure of the convention, make these files a good place for researchers to gain an initial orientation to the conventions.

Greetings: The Greetings files contain telegrams and letters sent by prominent individuals to the NAACP convention, along with lists of people from whom greetings were solicited. While many of the greetings are brief cordialities, some are quite expansive in their appreciation of the NAACP's work or on the cause of civil rights in general. The files include statements from both Presidents Truman and Eisenhower as well as from numerous senators; congressmen; federal officials; foreign leaders; state governors; religious, labor, and civil rights leaders; and entertainers, including Bryce Harlow, William Green, Mike Quill, Walter Reuther, A. Phillip Randolph, Frank Crosswaith, Kwame Nkrumah, Jawaharlal Nehru, Herbert Lehman, Eleanor Roosevelt, Hubert Humphrey, Lionel Hampton, and many others.

Legal Department: The Legal Department sessions, held at each convention through 1954, were organized by Thurgood Marshall and included attorneys and state NAACP conference presidents. The main objective was to teach local branch attorneys how to initiate civil rights litigation and to show the state conference presidents how to develop a support network for the litigants. Several areas of litigation were explored in these sessions, including employment discrimination, registration and voting, education, housing, segregation in public facilities, discrimination in the armed services, and police brutality. In addition, state conference presidents were instructed in legislative lobbying techniques in an effort to advance civil rights legislation in the states (which could then be used as grounds for civil rights litigation).

Minutes: These files contain scattered summary minutes of convention sessions, including both the general plenary sessions and specific panels and workshops. These minutes are itemized in the reel index of the user guide. Researchers should note, however, that numerous minutes are filed with the relevant committee and not in the Minutes file. Minutes found in the convention files have been itemized in the reel index of the user guide.

Program: These files contain both draft and final copies of the convention program. The correspondence provides a good overview of the convention planning, including decisions on what themes to emphasize at the sessions and for publicity purposes, invitations to guests and speakers, etc. The Program files are very helpful in providing an initial orientation for each of the conventions.

Publicity: These files detail the efforts of the national office, particularly the Public Relations Department, headed by Henry Lee Moon, to secure favorable publicity for the convention. They show the national office efforts to have the convention well publicized in the host city, and they contain correspondence between the Public Relations Director and the national press, the black press, and national television and radio networks. Internal memoranda discuss the problems and successes of these efforts.

Resolutions: The Resolutions files are usually divided into proposed resolutions and adopted resolutions. The former files contain Resolutions Committee drafts as well as proposed resolutions mailed to the Committee by rank-and-file NAACP members. The adopted resolutions files provide the final version of the resolutions voted on by the convention on a range of issues, including communism and anti-communism; segregation; labor policies; health, welfare, and housing policies; armed services and veterans' affairs; international affairs and colonialism; and many others. Adopted resolutions are indexed by subject in the subject index of the user guide.

Speeches: These files are also divided into two series--speakers and speeches. The Speakers files contain correspondence covering the negotiation of speaking engagements of prominent speakers for the convention, while the Speech files contain copies of the speeches themselves. The speeches, which are itemized in the reel index, include statements from such figures as Ralph Bunche, James B. Carey, Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, and many others, as well as the speeches of NAACP officers such as Walter F. White, Roy Wilkins, and Thurgood Marshall.

Time and Place: The Time and Place Committee was responsible for recommending the site of the upcoming convention. Its files frequently contain discussions of the financial and logistical requirements of the national convention, including hotel accommodations, meeting halls, entertainment, and the general hospitality of the proposed host city to blacks. There are frequent requests from local branches inviting the convention to meet in their city.

Trade Union Conference: A separate session at the convention for delegates from the American labor movement was begun in 1953 at the suggestion of the national labor relations assistant, Herbert Hill. The files on these sessions consist principally of invitations to unions to send delegates and of replies of union leaders, which are sometimes revealing of their attitude toward the civil rights movement. The chief aim of the sessions was to interest the union delegates in confronting employment discrimination against blacks, but efforts were often made to enlist the support of the union leaders in other NAACP objectives such as school desegregation and the elimination of racial discrimination. Among the many labor organizations represented in the files are the Teamsters, the Service Employees International Union, the International Union of Electrical Workers, the United Steelworkers, the United Brick and Clay Workers, the International Hod Carriers, the United Auto Workers, the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, the Laundry Workers International Union, the Packing House Workers, the Jewish Labor Committee, and various state CIO councils.

Youth: These files contain statistics on membership in NAACP Youth and College Chapters, minutes of Youth Conference meetings, and reports to the convention from the National Youth Work Committee, as well as internal correspondence and memoranda. Numerous NAACP youth leaders supply evidence of their political opinions and organizational skill. Meeting and conference minutes detail recruitment strategy and the concern over Communist infiltration.
